History of Harper’s Bazaar [UK]

The UK edition launched in 1929 and was conceived as a high-class publication for a sophisticated, aspirational readership. From the outset, this edition complemented the coverage of the U.S. publication by offering a special focus on the London and Paris fashion scenes. It also devoted many pages to reporting on social life and British society, demonstrating particular interest in high society and the lives of socialites and the aristocracy. Early issues include Evelyn Waugh writing “In Defence of Pleasure Cruising” and Vita Sackville-West on “The Province of Burgundy.” Exceptional literary content also forms a key component of this title; among the original works of fiction published in the early years were Somerset Maugham’s Cakes and Ale, Nancy Mitford’s The Refuge, and Gertrude Stein’s Left to Right.

In 1970 Harper’s Bazaar [UK] was amalgamated with Queen magazine, a society publication which had launched in 1861, to form Harper’s & Queen. The title was changed back to Harper’s Bazaar in 2006. While the magazine still pursues a stated aim of catering to a refined readership, its earlier preoccupation with the society world has given way to meritocratic coverage of a wide range of individuals and topics across fashion, the arts, lifestyle, and popular culture.
